The Safari Collection's boutique camps and lodges allow visitors to go into the wild in style

IMAGINE A GOLDEN PLAIN stretching as far as the eye can see. A tuft of dust rises on the horizon, distant at first but growing closer until, at last, in a great crashing wave, herds of wildebeests and zebras and gazelles hurtle across the African savanna. That's the sort of experience Tanya and Mikey Carr-Hartley had in mind when designing The Safari Collection, their portfolio of four boutique properties located in Kenya's wilderness. As native Kenyans and lifelong conservationists, the couple wanted to find a way to introduce people to their country while helping to sustain its wildlife and culture. Their solution: a string of luxury camps and lodges where guests can experience the region's marvels firsthand. "Wild spaces are hard to find in the world today," says Tanya. "Mikey was determined to ensure that areas he loved and had guided in would be protected for future generations."

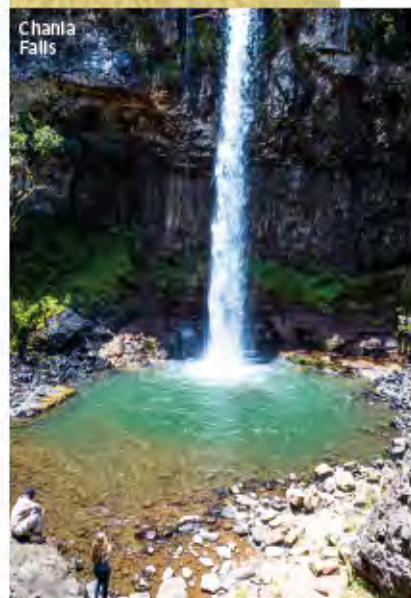

So far, the Carr-Hartleys have succeeded at their mission. Giraffe Manor, their most famous property, has long been a sanctuary for the endangered Rothschild's giraffe, and has welcomed guests from Brooke Shields to Mick Jagger. Their other properties also provide intimate experiences with wildlife: Sala's Camp offers an ideal vantage point for watching the Great Wildebeest Migration; Sasaab Lodge's airy cottages overlook the Ewaso Nyiro river, where elephants and other animals roam; and at Solio Lodge, set on a 45,000-acre wildlife refuge and rhino-breeding reserve, visitors can get up close to the rhinos on horseback, which is part of the appeal of The Safari Collection. "It restores an entire sense—the sense of hearing—that's lost on a motorized safari," say the Carr-Hartleys, "and it allows these special animals to see guests as one with the landscape." Keely Weiss
